As a garden history aficionado, I already knew how fascinating historical images of gardens can be -- allowing us to see how the way we beautify our yards and landscapes has changed over time. But I had no idea how much the White House gardens have metamorphosed over the past two centuries:1. Starting from the rudely-fenced swampy bog surrounding a burnt-out husk of a building (following the 1812 White House torching),2. through the early 19th century efforts to plant trees and shrubs to beautify the place,3. to the Victorian flowerbeds and glasshouse mania of the second half of the 19th century -- did you know that until 1902, a huge conglomerate of conservatories and multiple greenhouses were attached to the west side of the White House? I myself certainly had no idea, despite reading a number of books on the history of conservatories (Paradise Under Glass: An Amateur Creates a Conservatory Garden by Ruth Kassinger is an equally fascinating book about that topic). Learning this saddened me: to this advocate of limited government, Teddy Roosevelt's decision to sweep away the floral greenhouses and replace them with the West Wing is an unhappy indicator of the metastasizing growth of executive power -- might not the world be better off if our government spent more time growing flowers than making war and meddling in other peoples' lives?4.
